It is crucial that you be on time every day. Even if you are not presenting, having others join in late makes giving a presentation much more difficult. Please be considerate.

Combined World Language Depts. & CLLC Language Instruction Training Course

MICROTEACHING: GENERAL INFORMATION

1. You will be asked to teach two short lessons: first lesson (5 min.) and vocabulary and grammar focus (10 min.) and one 20- minute extended teaching segment. The specific details of these assignments will be presented during the morning lecture and discussed in your afternoon classes. General guidelines for peer teaching are given below.
2. Included in this syllabus is a copy of a lesson planning sheet for you to use for each assignment. Make a copy for yourself and a copy to bring to the session evaluator. Also included in this syllabus is a copy of the form report that will be given to your afternoon session leader by the morning instructor. This form is used to provide your afternoon instructor with feedback on your areas of strength and those areas that need improvement. You may discuss your evaluation with your afternoon instructor. Lesson plans must be written in English.
3. Each of your teaching assignments will be recorded. The video will be for you and your instructor/program director.
4. Visuals (clip art, drawings, or PowerPoint slides) will make your presentation more effective, but this is not required.

General Guidelines for Peer Teaching

In your lessons, you will present a progression of activities for developing the ability to communicate in a culturally appropriate manner in the language that you will be teaching. Although each lesson has a specific focus, all should be based on an overarching COMMUNICATIVE GOAL. Base your 20-minute lesson on a topic that differs from the one you presented in your 5-minute and 10-minute session. Assume no prior knowledge of the language; teach it all!

A. CONSIDER YOUR AUDIENCE: Some members of your peer teaching group know little of your language; direct your teaching towards them and try to ignore the fact that some others know as much as you do.

B. SELECT YOUR TOPIC AND OBJECTIVES: Assuming no prior knowledge on the part of your audience, design a series of activities to reach a communicative language goal in a culturally appropriate manner. Be sure to formulate your objective(s) from a student's perspective before planning your lesson. What should students be able to do by the end of the lesson? For example (communicative goals): At the end of the lesson, students will be able to...

- order a coffee and a pastry at a café in France.
- order lunch from a street vendor in Mexico City.
- describe flu-like symptoms to a doctor.
- introduce themselves at a friend's party.

C. PLAN YOUR LESSON: It should consist of four elements:

1) Presentation - First, present the new material (function(s) and/or, structures) within a realistic context. Consider:

- Set the context: with a picture on a PPT slide, with music, with props, etc.
- Repeat the communicative words/phrases multiple times before asking students to repeat
- Sequence new words/phrases in a logical order: "hello" before "My name is..." and "Goodbye"
- Present the new communicative words/phrases into small, "bite-sized" chunks (i.e., you don't present seven new words/phrases at one time)?

2) Practice - In this phase, students have a chance to work with what you have presented. Meaningful structured practice is suggested here. Consider:

- It is often good to build in a reception phase (comprehension check) before a production phase (asking students to use the words, phrases or structures); Example: Asking "Is this an apple?" before "What is this?" Recognition activities should precede cued or free recall activities
- Offer students ample opportunity to practice the communicative words/phrases with the instructor

3) Application - Students show you and themselves what they can do with what you are teaching them. Communicative (or at least meaningful) activity is expected here. Consider:

- Model (not describe) the entire activity from start to finish with a student before asking the students to apply the communicative words and/or phrases in independent practice?

4) Assessment - Evaluate whether your students learned what you wanted them to. You can do this, for example, through an additional communicative activity or mini-quiz. (For example, two students successfully model the activity together in front of the class.)

(These four elements above do not have to occur in this strict sequence; but they should all be present.)

D. USE VISUAL MATERIALS, if suitable to your presentation (photos, drawings, PowerPoints).

Computing at OSU and the Division of Arts and Humanities

What's available at OSU?

There are a number of computer labs on campus, most of which are overseen by the Office of Technology and Digital Innovation (OTDI). Lab sites, phone numbers, and hours are listed on the OTDI website: <http://odee.osu.edu/public-computing>

OTDI is the technical support office for the multimedia rooms in which many of you will teach during the year. They have a "help-line" you can use to access their services. Call 614-688-4357 or (8-HELP) or email classroomhelp@osu.edu. They will assist you with any classroom problems you are having trouble with -- from lights to computers.

Take some time to explore the ODEE website for other services.

Arts and Sciences Technology (ASCTech)

ASCTech offers computer and technical assistance to the faculty, staff and graduate students employed by the College of Arts and Sciences. Check out their website at <http://asctech.osu.edu/>
